Tired of fruit machines?

There are one or two computers that have an identity crisis in the current stormy computer market.

Among them are computers such as the Apple IIe and the Commodore 64. Both are in the $1,000 to $2,000 price range and are currently available at retail prices around $900.

Apple was the first company to offer a computer designed specifically for the home market. Apple has always been a leader in the computer industry, and its computers are well known for their reliability and ease of use.

The Apple person...as a computer...is...home.

The Commodore 64 is a more powerful computer, but it is more expensive. It has a larger screen and a more advanced operating system, but it also requires more memory and a more powerful power supply.

Dick Smith to win on price

AT a little while from now, the top end of the personal computer market is expected to be dominated by the Commodore, which has been able to release a new, improved version of its product.

Yet that's exactly what Dick Smith Electronics have done as their latest entry to the computer market.

The Commodore takes the prize for the best value in the personal computer market, with its powerful 8-bit CPU and advanced operating system.

Identity crisis set to change names

In fact, what made the Apple IIe so appealing at the time was the relative amount of third-party software available for it. The Commodore 64, on the other hand, has a much wider range of software available for it, making it a more attractive choice for many users.

Capacity

But there is one area where the two computers are not so similar: in terms of the ability to store and process data. The Apple IIe has a slower CPU and less memory than the Commodore 64, which can make it slower for some applications.

The Apple IIe is also not as powerful a computer as the Commodore 64, which is why it is not as popular with serious computer users.

In conclusion, the Apple IIe and the Commodore 64 are both excellent computers for home use, but the Commodore 64 offers more power and flexibility for those who need it.
Industry shake-out may affect many

The home computer industry is going through a shake-out period and only a handful of manufacturers will be left, according to the managing director of Trinity, Mike Murray.

"It was my first visit to Perth since taking over as managing director of Trinity," Mr Murray said.

"Trinity has always been a leading company in the home market and only one of four times a year we have been among the top 10. The company is working on the same lines and it should still be a strong player in the market.

"But the market has never been as bad as it is now. The market is moving away from large desktops and towards smaller, more portable models. The market is also becoming more competitive, with more companies entering the market."

Not the least of the problems faced by managers of color computer companies is the market and only one of four times a year we have been among the top 10. The company is working on the same lines and it should still be a strong player in the market.

Networks beat problems of isolation

Networking – the communication of computers with each other on telephone lines – has brought the world together from the geographical barriers of the past. The network is the highways of the future, says Dr. Frank Bracke, chief scientist of IBM.

Networking is becoming a powerful tool to reduce intellectual isolation and accelerate the process of discovery, according to Dr. Peter Braacke, chief scientist of IBM.

Dr. Bracke made the comment in the discussion of the New Directions in Computer Science and Computing at the University of WA.

He examined the impact of networking on environments of collaboration in both administrative and educational spheres and how these changes are unfolding in a new networking environment for scientists, engineers, universities, facilities and large organizations.

Networking – where computers communicate with each other on telephone lines – has brought the world together from the geographical barriers of the past. The network is the highways of the future, says Dr. Frank Bracke, chief scientist of IBM.

Networking was not always an easy task. In the beginning, when the network was first introduced, it was difficult to set up and maintain. However, with advances in technology, networking has become more accessible and user-friendly.

Highly-rated package given boost

There is a new communications software package that offers significantly better performance than similar programs. The program runs on IBM, APT Stora and CHM 200 series computers.

The program, called BTnet, was developed by a team of researchers at the University of New South Wales, who are part of the Australian Network Information Centre (ANIC). The team has been working on the program for several years and has finally reached a stage where it is ready for release.

Racing thrills now on screen

For those who are tired of playing games on the computer, there is now a new option: racing games on the screen. The latest racing game, called Super Speed, has been released and is available for download.

Super Speed is a fast-paced racing game that allows players to compete against each other in high-speed car races. The game features realistic graphics and sound effects, making it an immersive experience for players.
